Rocking the Languedoc wine scene

Outsiders

The Outsiders are a group of Languedoc-Roussillon wine producers. Working in the south of France, they are creating exciting wines which make full use of the region's highly diverse soil types, climatic conditions and grape varieties.

The group's members come from the UK, Ireland, the Netherlands, Switzerland, New Zealand, Sweden, the USA – and Bordeaux. What they have in common is a conscious decision to relocate to this part of France to make wine, recognising the potential of Languedoc-Roussillon's terroir.

Three of the Outsiders were involved in making or marketing others' wines, before crossing the line and becoming producers themselves. However, most of the Outsiders do not come from wine backgrounds; the group includes members with careers in nursery school teaching, business management, advertising, sales and marketing, strategic planning, TV production, property construction, investment banking, finance... and taxation.

Coming from “outside” means having an alternative perspective, which sometimes translates into doing things differently.

We hope you will find our approach refreshing, and our wines to your liking.

Bill Hicks (American comedian, 1961-1994)

Jan & Caryl Panman Château Rives-Blanques

Caryl (English) and Jan (Dutch) swapped a globe-trotting lifestyle for the backwaters of Cépie, in Languedoc's hilly, chilly Limoux. They bought Rives-Blanques (named after a Pyrenean peak) 10 years ago. The estate has 22 ha of vineyards and was one of first in France to be given the agriculture raisonnée accreditation. 2.4 ha of Chenin Blanc were planted in 1970 in anticipation of the 1972 blending-regulation changes and there are 7 ha of gnarled old Mauzac vines, gobelet trained. Their 9 ha of Chardonnay are divided into several vineyards, the highest of which has galets roulés stones – common in Châteauneuf-du-Pape and even Roussillon, but exceptional in Limoux, where they compete for space beneath the vines with a multitude of wild flowers. A couple of hectares of Sauvignon Blanc were planted in 2006 for a Vin de Pays.

Caryl works hard to promote their wines via their blog, website and e-newsletter, via which we learn that the Panmans are resilient sorts: so far this year they have been snowed in (twice), climbed the eponymous peak of Rives-Blanques, and sailed an Ette class dinghy (called BlanquEtte) over the Irish Sea.

Vianney Fabre

Château d'Anglès

CHÂTEAU
LA CLAPE

Château d'Anglès is one of the historic estates of La Clape. It was purchased by Eric Fabre in 2002; after eight years in Pauillac as technical director at Château Lafite Rothschild, he was ready to swap Bordeaux for Languedoc, and Château d'Anglès is now run as a family affair with his sons Vianney and Arnaud. They have 36 ha of vines on an 80-ha estate, the rest being wild, scrubby garrigue and Alep pine forest. The vineyards face the Mediterranean and benefit from the cooling sea breezes. A total of 12 ha are planted with white varieties (Bourboulenc, Marsanne, Roussanne and Grenache Blanc); the remainder are Syrah, Carignan, Mourvèdre and Grenache Noir vines. Eric believes that the standard copper-based treatments used by organic vineyards do the soil more harm than good, but the estate does not use insecticides and follows a sustainable land-management programme based on the Terra Vitis quality charter. Their AOC-only wines (30% white, 60% red, 10% rosé) are neither fined nor filtered.

Vianney grew up surrounded by prestigious bordelais vineyards. He has degrees in oenology and business and spent time in New York and Paris, followed most recently by four years in Champagne as Bollinger's export director, before opting to join his father in Languedoc where the decidedly different mentality, climate and terroir give them the chance to make timeless wines that are not influenced by trends or rigid traditions.

Peter & Deborah Core

Mas Gabriel

MAS GABRIEL

Mas Gabriel is a small organic wine domaine of 6 hectares in Caux, west of Pezenas and about 20km from the Mediterranean. It is owned and run by Deborah and Peter Core, a British couple who met in London in the 1990s; Deborah was working as a lawyer and Peter as a finance director. They left London in 2002 and spent 18 months in New Zealand completing a diploma in viticulture and winemaking at Tairawhiti Polytechnic in Gisborne. Work experience covered two vintages, including a gruelling three-month spell on the night shift at Sacred Hill Wines in Hawke's Bay for Peter. Returning to Europe, they worked the 2004 vintage at Château Bauduc (Bordeaux), and then moved to Languedoc at the end of that year. In 2006, after a long search, they bought a five hectare plot of vines from Domaine de la Garance, and took that harvest to produce Mas Gabriel's very first wine.

Their stated aim is simple: to produce great natural wines that express Mas Gabriel's highly unique terroir, which contains large quantities of volcanic basalt. Using Syrah, Grenache and old Carignan this produces powerful, elegant wines with great balance, length and freshness. Inspired by James Milton in New Zealand, they follow the biodynamic principles of Rudolph Steiner, treating the soil as a living organism and ensuring its health by applying well-composted cow manure in autumn, as well as natural plant teas and preparations. The small size of the domaine enables Peter and Deborah to do all the work in the vineyard and chai, the only exception being the happy band of locals and volunteers who help hand-pick the harvest each year. The domaine is certified organic with Ecocert.

Lidewij van Wilgen

Mas des Dames

Dutch woman Lidewij van Wilgen runs Mas des Dames, an 18th century farmhouse near Saint Chinian, surrounded by a contiguous 14-hectare vineyard in an amphitheatre-shaped valley. A former strategic director with a large Amsterdam advertising agency, she is the mother of three daughters (hence the domaine name). She took over the estate in 2002 when she came to France seeking an alternative to adland. Being a female Outsider was not easy: “I was surprised by the mentality of men in the agricultural sector. In my previous job, men with academic backgrounds worked for me without any problem, but here, workers doubted everything I said, simply because I was a woman.”

Yields average 35 hl/ha, grapes are picked and selected by hand, each plot is vinified in its own small tank, insecticides and chemical fertilizers are a no-no, and the range is small (two AOC Coteaux du Languedoc, two Vin de Pays d’Oc), with the emphasis on clean, pure fruit. Things are kept simple and honest: minimal use of sulphur, pigeage rather than remontage, and no new oak. “If you have clean grapes you don’t need to do much. Our way of winemaking is common sense, really.” Lidewij’s philosophy is “to make wines that are original, but also 100% Languedoc.”

Hildegard Horat La Grange de Quatre Sous

Hildegard Horat-Diop's 8 hectare organic estate sits beside an ancient Roman road, between Saint-Chinian and St-Jean de Minervois. She left her native Switzerland in 1983 to establish a vineyard, and ended up in the wild hinterland south of Assignan. She makes only Vin de Pays d'Oc wines – a deliberate choice born out of a desire to experiment and which has allowed her to plant varieties such as Malbec, Cabernet Sauvignon, Cabernet Franc and Viognier. Chardonnay, Marsanne, Syrah, Grenache, Mourvèdre and Cinsault complete the rich and varied varietal range of La Grange de Quatre Sous. Hildegard's white, rosé and red wines are made in the same way as she grows her vines: with great respect for the earth and the grapes it provides. She only uses natural yeasts, so the wines can best express their terroir and vintage.

Today, with an enviable reputation and more than a quarter of a century spent in the south of France, Hildegard and her partner Alioune are no strangers to Languedoc's quality winemaking scene, but in the early days, as outsiders, they struggled against the odds. Female winemakers were a rarity in France in the early 1980s; Hildegard's refusal to bow to the rules of the Saint-Chinian appellation and her natural inclination to farm her vines organically from the very start set her apart from the neighbouring domaines, who found her methods unorthodox. She has become known for her interesting blends and for introducing varieties which are rare in France, including the Swiss grape Petite Arvine.

Katie Jones

Domaine Jones

Katie is no stranger to the UK wine scene, or indeed to the south of France (prior to becoming a winemaker she spent 16 years working in sales and marketing for a leading Languedoc cooperative, based in the Corbières village of Tuchan). In 2007, 2.7 ha of 60-year-old Grenache vines planted on black slate came up for sale in Maury; Katie couldn't resist. It turned out that the vines were actually half Grenache Gris, some Grenache Noir, and a bit of Muscat and Carignan to boot. At first, the vineyard was a hobby, but in 2009, with no practical experience to speak of, she set up some equipment and vats to create a tiny winery and made her very first vintage, aided and abetted by her vigneron partner Jean-Marc and her winemaker David Morrison.

Domaine Jones plans to stay small. Total production in 2009 was only 6,000 bottles; next year, when more white is made, the figure should rise to 8,000. A recently-purchased 1,500-vine plot of Grenache, Carignan and Syrah will provide 2,000 bottles of Fitou, and that's the cut-off point.

Sir John Hegarty & Philippa Crane Hegarty Chamans

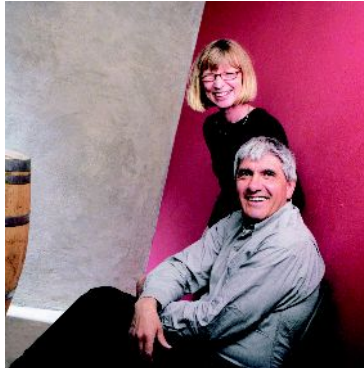

Creative director and founding partner of internationally-renowned ad agency Bartle Bogle Hegarty, John is the co-owner of Domaine Hegarty Chamans and some 20 hectares of vines in the Minervois area. Working with his New Zealand partner Philippa Crane and winemaker Samuel Berger, he produces award-winning wines (his Cuvée No. 1, 2003 was awarded 92 points by Robert Parker's Wine Advocate in October 2007 and was described as "damned delicious"; in 2009 the same publication declared their Syrah-dominant Black Knight 2005 "dynamic" and gave it 93 points).

John and Philippa came to Languedoc in 2002 with no wine background; they brought with them an outsider's perspective and a desire to question the status quo. Their domaine is Ecocert-certified since 2009 and will have Demeter status from the 2010 harvest. As you'd expect, John markets his wines with a certain flair (Hegarty Chamans' Black Sheep logo is "there to remind us that the Languedoc is a region that offers the opportunity to make exciting wines if you don't follow the crowd"). Fittingly, in his speech at the 2010 Masters of Wine Symposium in Bordeaux he urged the the wine trade to "lose the mystery but keep the magic".

Anna-Lena & Yvon Gentes Domaine de Calet

DOMAINE DE CALET

Anna-Lena (a nursery school teacher) and Yvon (a major player in the Swedish seafood industry) spent 30 years together in her native Sweden before coming to live in the southern Rhône valley in 1999. With successful careers behind them, they were ready for a new challenge: wine appealed. They bought a run-down domaine on the edge of the Camargue, in the Costières de Nîmes appellation, and set about putting its 38 hectares of vines in order, replanting 65% of the vineyard with local varieties (Marselan, Mourvèdre, Syrah, Roussanne, Bourboulenc, Clairette, Vermentino) - and some Chardonnay. They farm their vines according to French agricultural guru Jean-Pierre Cousinié's method (based on highly-focused observation and analysis of all stages of the viticultural process), with input from their renowned winemaker-neighbour Mark Kreydenweiss and Australian oenologist David Morrison, and a nod in the direction of biodynamics; the domaine will have official organic status in 2012.

The Gentes' pioneering spirit is evident. They worked with the Chambre d'Agriculture on test plantings of Marselan prior to its being accepted into the Costières de Nîmes AOC, and their next project is focused on the development of oidium-resistant vines. They have created a successful micro-business making personalised cuvées for groups of Scandinavian wine lovers, and regularly welcome visitors to their domaine; amongst the most recent were the Japanese crew members of the Peace Boat initiative, who spent a day harvesting grapes to be made into their very own "Vin de la Paix", which will be used to raise funds. "People don't buy products any more, they buy services, so you have to personalise what you're selling, and do things differently," says Yvon, who combines business savvy with a generous disposition.

Jonathan Hesford

Domaine Treloar

Ten years ago Rachel (a New Zealander) and Jonathan (a Brit) were living and working one block away from the World Trade Center in New York. They lost their home and jobs as a result of September 11th but happily found a new direction through a passion for wine. Their path led them to Plumpton College (Sussex), Halfpenny Green Vineyards (Staffs), a Viticulture and Oenology Postgraduate Diploma from Lincoln University (New Zealand), and almost two years at Neudorf Vineyards, where Jon was assistant winemaker.

In 2005 they came to Languedoc-Roussillon to produce their own wines and bought an ancient winery and 10 ha of vines on hillside sites in the Aspres sub-region of Roussillon. A huge amount of work ensued: renovating and modernising the winery, creating their own identity and – not least - making truly hand-crafted wine. Domaine Treloar's wide variety of traditional cépages and the (relatively) flexible winemaking regulations have helped them to create, single-handedly, a range of individual wines which have quickly won international acclaim.

Catherine Wallace

Château Combebelle

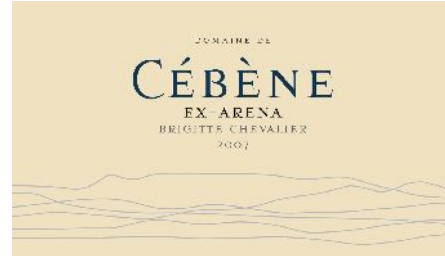

Catherine is a Brit with over 15 years' experience in the UK wine trade (she worked for Majestic, Adnams and Lay & Wheeler). With WSET exams up to Diploma level under her belt, she wanted to make her own wine; in 2005, with her partner Patrick, she bought the biodynamically-farmed Château Combebelle from fellow countryman and eco-pioneer Robert Eden. The domaine is 300 metres above sea level, perched on a hillside a couple of kilometers from the village of Villespassans. It's the highest vineyard in Saint Chinian, made up of 11 hectares of Syrah and Grenache vines (with plans to plant more soon, including white). Historically this was red wine territory but Catherine has a thing for rosé, so she made her first in 2006. She is studying to become a Master of Wine, and is highly enthusiastic about her adoptive region: "The potential for really good-quality wines, not just here but across the entire Languedoc region, is huge – that's what drew me to this part of France." We like her refreshingly down-to-earth approach: "If you can bake a Victoria sponge, you can make wine... the tricky thing is selling it."

Brigitte Chevalier Domaine de Cébène

Previously export manager with Bordeaux wine merchant Jean-Luc Thunevin, Brigitte came to Languedoc in 2006 to make wine her own way. She began by using grapes bought-in from other growers; today, while continuing with this policy, Brigitte manages her own wine merchant company, Chevalier Vins, and also makes top-notch wines from her Domaine de Cébène estate.

Brigitte's vineyards are in two contrasting areas, one in Faugères, the other in Corneilhan (20 km from the Mediterranean). Her winemaking quest is for freshness and perfect fruit aromas, with as little intervention as possible. Her cuvées have terroir-tastic names: Ex Arena means "out of the sand" (the plot in question is a 40 metre-deep bed of sea sediment), and Felgaria is the old name for Faugères; this wine's grapes come from deep-rooted vines grown on the schist hillsides and terraces in the far north of the appellation, at 300 metres altitude. "I want to make vin du nord (wine from the north) in the sud (south)," she says. She has already captured the style and delicate flavor of cooler-appellation wines in the Languedoc, proving that her winemaking skills are equal to her commercial talents.

Ryan O'Connell

O'Veineyards

Ryan O'Connell is the twenty-something Franco-American founder of Love That Languedoc – an English/French blog about the wines and winemakers of Languedoc-Roussillon. He arrived in the region with his parents Joe (American) and Liz (French-Vietnamese) in 2005, as part of a family decision to trade a life building luxury homes in Florida for an altogether earthier sort of existence. Their estate in Cabardès has views of the medieval city of Carcassonne and a decidedly un-French yet memorable name. The O'Connells farm 16 hectares of Merlot, Syrah and Cabernet Sauvignon. They've built two wineries and with the help of a lot of books, a consultant, a lab technician and friends, now have a range of five wines.
